

Serbia's Military Success Is Due to the Serbian Trained Leader

With Few Men, Little Money, Rheumatism-Crippled General Putnik Is Working Miracles

By HENRY WOOD
(United Press Staff Correspondent)

GENERAL HEADQUARTERS OF THE SERBIAN ARMY, Kragujevac, Serbia, April 27.—(By mail to New York)—"There can be but one outcome to the present war. The allies have almost completely encircled the Austro-German empire with a wall of steel and fire. Against this impossible barrier the Austro-Germans are now beating out their evil-diminishing resources in hopeless effort. It is merely a question of time until they must be beaten."

With this statement—the longest interview he has ever granted—Field Marshal Jutnik, chief of staff, and the silent "Joffe" of the Serbian army, received me at general headquarters today. The Serbians call him the "Joffe," and the Germans might admit that he is the Serbian "Hindenburg," for at the close of the second Balkan war the German military attaché with the Serbian army, in his official report to the German government, paid high tribute to General Putnik as the greatest military strategist of modern times.

Like the French generalissimo, Putnik is taciturn in ordinary conversation and speechless when it comes to military operations. Brief as are the communiques given out by the Serbian government, they are altogether too verbose for the commander in chief. At the close of the last great battle with the Austrians in December, when Putnik drove the enemy out of Serbia and forced them to leave behind 30,000 dead and 40,000 prisoners, he forcibly expressed his disapproval of the text of the official communique.

This was General Putnik's own idea of how the communique should read: "Following our operations of the last three weeks, there are now no Austrian soldiers on Serbian soil, except prisoners."—Putnik.

Putnik's great ability as a strategist first brought him into prominence in the last two Balkan wars. He crushed the Turks, and by such carefully planned strategy that the Serbian losses were comparatively very small. At the famous battle of Komorovo the Turks left 50,000 dead and wounded on the field, and the Serbians only 16,000. He was equally successful at Monastir and at Pilip. In the present war his remarkable ability in handling armies was brought to a still greater test, owing to the exhausted resources of his forces, following the two previous wars.

In the final clash with the Austrian forces at Sabatz and Lotzmitza, where early in September the enemy suffered their first crushing defeat at the hands of the Serbians, General Putnik's army, nevertheless, lost heavily. There followed one of the masterly retreats in history. It was not until early in November that the Austrians gathered another army and started against Serbia. They planned first to take Kragujevac, where the Serbian arsenal is located, then to march on to Nish, the temporary capital, and then on even to Salonika, the Aegean port, at which Austria has cast long eyes for half a century.

Putnik's army had spent nearly all its remaining munitions in two months of trench warfare intervening between the September and November campaigns. France promised aid, but it was known that it would be weeks in arriving. It was during these weeks that the Serbian "Joffe" performed miracles of strategy. He placed his troops at points in the mountain passes the Austrians were forced to traverse and at a minimum expenditure of ammunition held back the invaders until the French ships reached Salonika. When aid came the Austrians were within a few miles of Kragujevac.

With the fresh supplies of ammunition, Putnik fell on the advancing Austrians, crushing them, and driving them completely out of Serbia. At Kragujevac, Nish, Valjevo and a half dozen other towns hundreds of men are still working today, putting into shape for future use the cannon and ammunition captured from the Austrians.

General Putnik's military genius is all the more astounding because it is purely of home development. He never went to Russia, Germany or France, as have most of the Balkan generals, to study military science, as have most of the Balkan generals. He began his career as a major in the war against Bulgaria in 1885 and rose gradually until the victories he won in the present war made him a field marshal.

During the Balkan war General Putnik contracted rheumatism from sleeping on rainy battlefields. He was under treatment at an Austrian bath resort when the Austrian ultimatum was flashed to Serbia last summer. He caught the first train for Serbia, was stopped by the Austrians at the frontier, but was released when it was found there was no possible pretext for holding him. Foreign military attaches believe the outcome of the present war might have been changed if the Austrians had prevented Putnik from crossing into his native country.

General Putnik's sufferings from rheumatism has been added to since the war began by severe attacks of asthma. Despite all this, and notwithstanding his advancing age, he continues at his post as chief of staff. A set of brilliant officers surround him in his little room and execute his orders. His personal staff includes his son-in-law, a major in the Serbian army. During the few hours he is off duty he spends his time at his daughter's house.
